- Abstract ***:

The reality shows that Micro, Small, and Medium Enterprises (MSMEs) play a very important role in economic growth. Even MSMEs are the only micro institutions that have not been shaken by the monetary crisis that began in 1988. However, as one of the mainstay sectors of society, especially the lower-middle-class economic community, the role of MSMEs has not been maximized, so they have not been able to compete fully and, even worse, many MSMEs have gone out of business or are inactive. Many factors cause the inability of SMEs to compete, among others, due to low innovation and competitiveness, so they have not been able to win competition both in the national and international spheres. The decrease in the number of MSMEs from active to inactive is also a concern. This study aims to analyze the locus of control (LoC) of MSMEs in Pangkalpinang City to determine its impact on their competitiveness. The research uses a descriptive qualitative approach with a case study method. The data collection technique used is in-depth interviews with three informants who are experts in the field of MSMEs in Pangkalpinang City. The data analysis technique used is thematic analysis. The results show that the locus of control (LoC) of MSMEs in Pangkalpinang City is internal, which means they believe that their success depends on their own efforts and abilities. This internal locus of control (LoC) has a positive impact on the competitiveness of MSMEs in Pangkalpinang City.
